I EXPEDITION TO DERRY TREACHEROUS POLICY OF MOUNTJOY. A. D. 1600. Whilst the prince of Ulster was awakening and organizing the South, a new English deputy had arrived in Dublin, a more formidable enemy by far than any whom O'Neill had yet encountered. Charles Blount, Baron Mountjoy, who was not only an experienced officer, but a nobleman of much learning and taste, a bookish man, as his secretary describes him, --a powerful theologian and confuter of Papists, arrived in February to take the command in Ireland. He had strict instructions to establish at once powerful garrisons in Derry and Ballyshannon; and to effect this paramount object, additional troops were to be poured into Ireland and placed at the governor's disposal;--a fleet of transport ships was to be provided.--No toil, or peril, or blood; no fraud, corruption, or treasure, was to be spared which might become necessary for the reduction of this re-Camden. renowned Northern chieftain and his gallant Ulster sept under the sway of England Not that the queen of that country had any claim to the North, or any subjects there, or any just quarrel with the inhabitants or their chiefs; but English undertakers lusted after the broad lands of Ulster;--English divines longed to undertake the rich livings, the fertile carucates, ballyboes, and plow-lands wherewith Catholic piety had endowed that Northern church. And besides, an Irish annalist tells us, it was great vexation of mind to the...
