Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Syllabus of Lectures on European History I. History defined. The blank knowledge of facts which is all that most readers gather from their historical studies, is a mere deposition of rubbish without cohesion, resting upon no basis of theory applied to the political development of nations, and accounting for the great stages of their internal movements. To such persons history is an old almanac merely. It is because of this estimate placed upon the past efforts of the human family that an intelligent man could be led to say that he thanked God that he had never charged his memory with a single historical fact; that, on the contrary, he had, out of profound contempt for a sort of knowledge so utterly without value in his eyes, anxiously sought to extirpate from his memory any relics of historical records which might happen to survive from his youthful studies; that the whole vast series of history had become a wilderness, and his mind, as touching all such absurd knowledge, under the blessing of Heaven, a tabula...
